They gave these cartridges to the sowars (mounted soldiers) of the 3rd Light Cavalry, and ordered them to bite them; the troopers objected to it, and said that they would never bite them, for if they did, their religion and faith would be destroyed ... upon this the British officers paraded the men of the 3 Regiments and having prepared 1,400 English soldiers, and other Battalions of European troops and Horse Artillery, surrounded them, and placing six guns before each of the infantry regiments, loaded the guns with grape and made 84 new troopers prisoners, and put them in jail with irons on them ... The reason that the sowars of the Cantonment were put into jail was that we should be frightened into biting the new cartridges. On this account, we and all our country-men, having united together, have fought the British for the preservation of our faith ... On 25 September James Outram and Henry Havelock arrived, cut through the rebel forces, and reinforced the British garrisons. Twenty days later Colin Campbell, who was appointed as the new Commander of British forces in India, came with his forces and rescued the besieged British garrison. Barker's painting celebrates the moment of Campbell's entry. At the centre of the canvas are the British heroes – Campbell, Outram and Havelock. The gestures of the hands of those around lead the spectator's eyes towards the centre.

Q.46 Read the passage and answer the questions:

Peasants and Their Land

The term which Indo-Persian sources of the Mughal period most frequently used to denote a peasant was raiyat (plural, raiyay) or muzarian. In addition, we also encounter the terms Nisan or asami. Sources of the seventeenth century refer to two kinds of peasants—khud-kashta and pahi-kashta. The former were residents of the village in which they held their lands. The latter were non-resident cultivators who belonged to some other village, but cultivated lands elsewhere on a contractual basis. People became pahi-kashta either out of choice—for example, when terms of revenue in a distant village were more favorable—or out of compulsion—for example, forced by economic distress after a famine. Seldom did the average peasant of northern India possess more than a pair of bullocks and two ploughs: most possessed even less. In Gujarat, peasants possessing about six acres of land were considered to be affluent. In Bengal, on the other hand, five acres were the upper limit of an average peasant farm; 10 acres would make one a rich asami. Cultivation was based on the principle of individual ownership. Peasant lands were bought and sold in the same way as the lands of other property owners. This nineteenth-century description of peasant holdings in the Delhi-Agra region would apply equally to the seventeenth century: the cultivating peasants (asamis), who plough up the fields, make the limits of each field, for identification and demarcation, with borders of (raised) earth, brick, and thorn so that thousands of such fields may be counted in a village.

Sources of the seventeenth century refer to which two kinds of peasants?

2. Raiyat, Pahi-Kashta
3. Kisan, Pahi-Kashta
4. Pahi-Kashta, Khud-Kashta

Q.47 Read the passage and answer the questions:Peasants and Their Land

The term which Indo-Persian sources of the Mughal period most frequently used to denote a peasant was raiyat (plural, raiyay) or muzarian. In addition, we also encounter the terms Nisan or asami. Sources of the seventeenth century refer to two kinds of peasants—khud-kashta and pahi-kashta. The former were residents of the village in which they held their lands. The latter were non-resident cultivators who belonged to some other village, but cultivated lands elsewhere on a contractual basis. People became pahi-kashta either out of choice—for example, when terms of revenue in a distant village were more favorable—or out of compulsion—for example, forced by economic distress after a famine. Seldom did the average peasant of northern India possess more than a pair of bullocks and two ploughs: most possessed even less. In Gujarat, peasants possessing about six acres of land were considered to be affluent. In Bengal, on the other hand, five acres were the upper limit of an average peasant farm; 10 acres would make one a rich asami.

Cultivation was based on the principle of individual ownership. Peasant lands were bought and sold in the same way as the lands of other property owners. This nineteenth-century description of peasant holdings in the Delhi-Agra region would apply equally to the seventeenth century: the cultivating peasants (asamis), who plough up the fields, make the limits of each field, for identification and demarcation, with borders of (raised) earth, brick, and thorn so that thousands of such fields may be counted in a village.

In Bengal, what was the upper area limit of an average peasant farm?

1. Two Acres
2. Five Acres
3. Fifteen Acres
4. Three Acres

Options 1. 1

2. 2
